After effects free transform mask

If worn widely enough in crowded and indoor settings where most transmission seems to occur, these masks could potentially stop the epidemic altogether. Designing and producing such masks and persuading large numbers of people to wear them is not straightforward and poses engineering, manufacturing, and marketing challenges that may ultimately require tradeoffs. A nurse executive in San Antonio created N95-caliber masks using materials found in local hardware stores. For instance, they might exhibit the colors or logos of individuals' favorite sports teams or brands. Scientists believe that Covid-19 is largely transmitted via virus-containing particles that people emit when they breathe, speak, cough, or sneeze. There is debate about how much COVID-19 spreads through aerosols and whether the added protection N95s provide against them is necessary. There are increasing examples of how these characteristics might be achieved. Given the stakes, the federal government should convene companies and forge public-private partnerships to expedite the process of developing, validating, and scaling effective designs. Masks like this would give people control over their own safety, a greater incentive to wear them, and the confidence to resume economically important activities. N95 masks, if worn correctly, can block nearly all of that spread. And a Stanford team designed a similarly effective version that adapts off-the-shelf snorkeling masks.
